Shortly before the season, Formula 1 Commission confirmed united support for new qualifying system that would still have three separate sessions, but instead of having the slowest drivers eliminated at the end of each session, they would be dropped continuously one by one every 90 seconds. All cars would have seven minutes to set their times in the beginning of the session, and seven drivers would be eliminated. Another seven drivers would be eliminated in the second session after having six minutes to set their times, and the remaining eight would advance. In the final session, with five minutes to set their times before the elimination period, until two cars would be left for the final minute-and-a-half duel. The implementation was deferred to the Spanish Grand Prix, but then implemented for the first race in Melbourne, where it was met with complete misunderstanding from the teams, drivers, media, and fans. Nonetheless, it was still used in the next race, before all interested parties agreed to revert to the 2015 qualifying format.
